

Country: Finland

1. How collective bargaining works in this country

- General Applicability (Erga Omnes): Unorganized employers must observe at least the minimum provisions of a national collective agreement if it is considered "representative" in their specific sector.
- Predominantly Sector-Level: According to OECD/AIAS ICTWSS data and industrial relations literature, collective bargaining in Finland has traditionally been highly centralized. While Finland relied heavily on cross-industry tripartite income policy agreements for decades, the system shifted around 2016 toward manufacturing-led pattern bargaining at the sector/industry level.

2. Data availability

- Which period is covered? What is available?
 - Source: <https://www.finlex.fi/en/authorities/collective-agreements/2025>).
 - What is available: National collective agreements (Työehtosopimukset) and official relevant legal decisions and rulings from 2001-2026.

4. Challenges

- What obstacles exist to accessing or using this data?
- Because Finland has increasingly delegated the setting of actual pay and specific conditions to local, company-level negotiations, the national sector-level agreements available on Finlex often represent only the minimum "floor." Tracking the actual conditions negotiated dynamically on the shop floor is much harder, as local firm-level agreements are not centralized in the public Finlex database.
